

Nota bene : ce sont ici les premiers messages, tels que je les ai reçus, donc avant correction puis publication sur le blog. Ceci permet de se rendre compte des capacités réelles de ce groupe. Je n'ai laissé que les initiales des prénoms.

Jxxxxe2010-09-26 14:07

I chose the Lion and the Mouse moral : « a kindness is never wasted. » It is the one which suits me the best because it goes well with my personality. I may be naive but as far as I'm concerned, relationships are made of exchanged kindness, and even very little things or services count, even very little things you do for another are one day going to bring you some happiness. Actually when you help somebody or whatever, this person is indebted to you and has to show her gratefulness repaying you, that is to say, doing something for you (anything good). Inversely, when someone is there for you, then you have to be there for this person someday. That's the best way to thank her.

The moral I rejected is « there is a time for work and a time for play » from the Ants and the Grasshopper fable. I do not agree with it. According to me, you don't have to organize your life by such a way : if everything was planned then life would be boring. I think the real challenge and the real joy is to manage to mix work and « playing. » In my opinion, having fun through your work, through what you are doing everyday, it's just the key of happiness.

Jxxxxe 2010-09-26 15:27

→ So I chose the moral of the fable THE FOX AND THE STORK. "Do not play tricks on your neighbors unless you can stand the same treatment yourself"

I chose this moral because everytime my sisters do something to me, like stealing my clothes I tell them that.

And I think it is true, we do not have to do bad things to people because we will be upset if they do something bad to us, we won't accept so why do we have to do to others what we do not want to endure ourselves ? I really believe in this moral, I think we all should follow it.

→ Then I chose the moral from the fable THE WOLF AND THE HOUSE DOG. "There is nothing worth so much as liberty".

In this fable, I agree, there is nothing worth than liberty but generally, the moral is incomplete. I strongly believe that joy, happiness, family, friendship and love are THE things that matter more than everything in the world !

Exxxxe2010-09-28 21:15

I chose the moral of "The hares and the frogs" : " However unfortunate we may think we are there is always someone worse off than ourselves".

Often, when we are depressing and we feel it happens only to us, we have to think there are people more unfortunate. We have to think ourself lucky to have a family and friends to help us.

Then I rejected the moral of "The wolf and the house dog" : "There is nothing worth so much as liberty".

I think it is a good idea but there are many essential things as love or solidarity. We are not totally free despite the fact that liberty is a right.

Axxxxs2010-09-28 21:53

I chose the moral of The Wolf and the House Dog : 'There Is Nothing Worth So Much As Liberty'. Feeling free and act as you want is definitely the most important thing on Earth and one of the worse sentence ever is the prison. That means taking back your freedom, your place into the society. We have the chance to live in a country where we're in general allowed to move, think, act and speak freely. But this is not the case everywhere in the world. I'm thinking of governments which require people to live in a certain way, a way of live they didn't choose. But how many of us do really know about liberty ? There're always rules and limits which prevent you from doing what you want. Of course, without regulation, it'll be the anarchy but without the feeling of the liberty too. For exemple, Native Americans fought against colonists to defend their freedom. So I think that liberty is essential for an human being.

I disagree with the moral of The Bundle Of Sticks : 'In unity is strength'. I think that our success only depends of us, that we're alone to succeed in life and that we can't count on anybody. There's always someone who wants to take avantage of us because it's the human's nature to want the best at the expence of the others. I rather think that the individualism is the real strength.

Cxxxxxe . N 2010-09-28 22:04

■ I chose the moral from the fable "The Lion and the Mouse", who is "A kindness is never wasted"

So I chose this moral because it is very simple but it's very true. In fact, I think that however the person, ugly or very small, or very tall, she cans help you. Even if she is not really physically perfect, she cans be very kind, and nice, and very cleaver. We should never laugh or insult at this person because she could give back to you a service one day, when you will have a problem, like the mouse.

More than, I think that every relations in the world rest on the kindness, and if all the persons refuse it because somebody have some default, there wouldn't be human relations, and no dialogues.

■ The moral that I don't like or that I don't agree is in the fable "The ants and the grasshopper". The moral is "There's a time for work and a time for play". I disagree because we can play and work at the same time, especially in english or spanish studies, we can learn languages with games, in the cinema or in theatres...

Lxxxxx-xxxxxe B.2010-09-29 14:45

The moral that suits me best is the moral of "The lion and the mouse", which is "A kindness is never wasted". In fact, I think that this moral is very important nowadays because for some people, doing somebody a favour is too difficult for them. I think that relationship are based on exchanges between people, so helping someone should be something usual. In the fable, the lion didn't think that a mouse can repay him what he did.

The moral I discord with is the one of "The ants and the grasshopper" which is "There's a time for work and a time for play", because i think that we can put some joyce and so humour in our work. I think that we can play and work in the same time.

(...)